

Humorous and Light-Hearted Graduation Speech

Subject: Finally, You're Free!

Dear Graduates (and those who survived raising you),

Well, we made it! I wasn't sure we would, especially after that incident with the science lab and the fire alarm—but here we are!

Looking at you all in your caps and gowns, I'm reminded of your first day here. Some of you couldn't find your classrooms. Others couldn't open their lockers. A few of you are still trying to figure out the lunch schedule. But you know what? You figured out the important stuff—how to think critically, how to solve problems, and most importantly, where the vending machines are located.

They say that school prepares you for life. Well, if that's true, then you've learned some valuable lessons: deadlines are real, coffee is essential, and there's no such thing as a stupid question—though some of you came really close a few times!

In all seriousness (yes, I can be serious), you've accomplished something remarkable. You've completed your education despite countless distractions—social media, video games, and the constant temptation to check your phones during class. Speaking of which, yes, I knew you were doing that. I'm old, not blind.

As you venture into the real world, remember these important life lessons: Google is your friend, but don't believe everything you read on the internet. Sleep is important—you'll miss nap time from kindergarten. And finally, no matter how successful you become, always be nice to people—you never know when you'll need someone to explain technology to you when you're my age.

Go out there and be amazing. Make us proud. And please, visit us sometimes so we can say, "I knew them when they were just troublemakers in my school!"

Congratulations, Class of [Year]! You did it!

With pride and a healthy sense of humor,
